Panel Overview

For over two decades, efforts have been underway to engage community leadership and build local capacity to improve health and health care. The community, where people live and work, is the locus of responsibility for the delivery of many health care and social services to individuals, and the setting where population health programs coupled with the oftentimes independent actions of other sectors, including education, business and environment, determine to a significant degree, the health of the population. This panel will discuss how the ACO model may be adapted to the community level, focusing particularly on the opportunities and challenges posed by this approach.

Core Questions

- What differentiates community-based accountable care arrangements from traditional ACOs?
- How are community-based accountable care arrangements structured and operate?
- What are the biggest challenges faced by community-based accountable care organizations?
